FORM ORGANIZATION

was lengthened. The average length of the rural routes in the mid-Columbia area is 30 miles.

The aims and purposes of the National Rural Letter Carriers' association are to increase the efficiency of the service and serve the public better. It was pointed out that there is no branch of service like the postal service. Post office employes are in closer touch with the public than any other public or private business. Being public servants, rather than wave carners, is the standihat all government employes take. Post office employes are to be likened to the city firemen, city police, schoot teachers; they work for the public and must have the interest of the people in their hearts. People who work for private individuals and companies, work for their own personal gain, which must show a grofit. But public servants can sever show a profit; all that they ever hope to show is that they have done heir apointed task well, and that the people will appreciate it.

A route of 24 miles pays $1800 a month to keep a car running on the average rural conte. The four cents per mile per day muintenance money for the car, about $170 per month. If costs $50 a month to keep a car running.

Columbia Rising Rapidly

The Columbia river has been rising here at the rate of six inches each 24 hours, and the gnage on the interstate bridge stands at 24½ feet above zero. River men expect a sharp rise the latter part of the week.

Indications point to flood conditions equal to those of 1921, if not worse. The company operating the interstate bridge plans on utilizing a ferry, in case the road connecting the bridge with the Columbia river highway is inundated.
