73 Years In Cascade Locks

BY JACK McCRARY

After the Oregon Steam Navigation became thoroughly organized in 1863 it drove all competition off the river above Fort Vancouver. Individuals appeared with new boats from time to time and tried to muscle in on the business, but the company soon absorbed them and their boats.

In 1856 the federal government built a wagon road from the Upper Cascades to the Lower Cascades, but it never carried a great deal of traffic because there was no highway down the Columbia and the public had no use for it.

In 1868 the Oregon Steam Navigation company built a telegraph line up the river from Portland to The Dalles, and in 1869 finished the line on through to Boise, Idaho. As a young fellow I worked on the line and it used to be my job to keep the wires up. There was not a great deal of work in the summer, but there was plenty to do in the winter after hard storms had swept through the gorge.

About the time the telegraph line was built the Warrens constructed their packing plant at Warrendale and commenced to pack fish. From that time on things began to move faster up in this section of the country. The gold rush, which had taken thousands of men into Idaho and Montana, was over and the Indians had quieted down. The Dalles had grown into a considerable town and people were becoming prosperous.

In 1869 Z. F. Moody, for whom Moody's addition in Cascade Locks was named, became agent for Wells Fargo company at The Dalles, and it wasn't long before he got hold of the government contract for carrying the mail between Portland and the upper country.

A year or two after the telegraph line had been finished, Moody started work on a road from the Upper Cascades to the Lower Cascades on the Oregon side of the river. Jim Thompson had come across the river in the late '50s after working for the Bradfords and started his sawmill on the present site of the We-Ask-U-Inn.

Moody got hold of the tract of land which Thompson had occupied and built his stables on it. He held on to the tract and in later years subdivided it into town lots. Moody was a successful business man in The Dalles at the beginning of the civil war, and went up the Columbia and founded the town of Umatilla in 1863, at the time John Hailey started his stage line from the Columbia to the Boise basin. He owned a store at Umatilla and in 1882 the republicans elected him governor of Oregon.

The contracts for carrying the mail were pretty widely sought after in those days and it took a hard fight to get them, so Moody must have been a good scrapper to beat out the Oregon Steam Navigation company. He had a steamboat known as the Otto on the river below Bonneville, and a second steamboat known as the Teaser on the river above Cascade Locks. He brought mail, freight and passengers up the Columbia to Bonneville, where he transferred to his stages and freight wagons. In Ralph Mattley of Portland has taken over the Rapids barber shop in Erick Erickson's Rapids club and is now in active charge. He expects to put on a second barber and will keep two chairs in operation. The is the property of his father, who has a shop at Sixth and Flanders in Portland. He has been working in Walla Walla for the past two years.

The Chronicle, crowded out of its old quarters by progress and the influx of new business houses, is temporarily domiciled on the second floor of the Glover building, across the street from its old location. It hopes to have a permanent home within another week.
