After a month he gave up all thought of asking for hospitalization and began casting about for something to do. The Bonneville dam attracted his attention and he came up to Cascade Locks, saw an opportunity and determined to remain.

CAMP KITCHENS
SUPPLY GOOD
FOOD FOR MEN

Few men on public works anywhere live better than employees on Bonneville dam. And that goes for all of the camps. The tables are heavy with food.

Months ago the army engineers laid out a tract of land near the railroad station on which living quarters were built. There are two groups of bunkhouses and a third group is being built. The first, seven in number, are occupied by government employees who live in camp; the second is occupied by employees of the Guy F. Atkinson company; the third, now building, will be occupied by employees of the Columbia Construction company, contractors on the $10,000,000 spillway dam.

Samuel C. Lancaster, the engineer who built the Columbia River highway, recently said he had never been in a construction camp where men lived better or enjoyed better food than is served at Bonneville.

The government employees have their own kitchen, chefs and mess hall. The kitchens are immaculate, the foods of the best. The bunkhouses occupied by these employees are clean, airy and heated with wood stoves.

In the Atkinson camp the bunkhouses are laid out in streets. The men have never had cause for complaint over the food or living conditions, and because they have been well treated there has never been any evidence of labor trouble. The food here, like the food in the government camp, is of the best.
