LOOKING AHEAD

It hasn't been so very many years ago, as most folks will recall, when the easiest way to get an argument out of a man was to mention "good roads." The auto was just beginning to become popular, though sentiment was about evenly divided as to whether it would prove a permanent method of transportation or a passing fad. The good roads question was a national issue, and it was possible to find whole families divided as to the wisdom of building any better roads than those in use for horse-drawn vehicles.

Today there is no argument about it. Every one from coast to coast, and lakes to gulf, is agreed that the auto will always be this nation's leading mode of transportation and that the welfare and prosperity of every community, large or small, hinges on the condition of the roads leading to it. Today the nation would practically collapse if it were forced to return to gravel or dirt roads and horse-drawn vehicles. Realizing this, those who are far-seeing are insisting that every new road that is built be made wide enough to carry twice the traffic now operating over it, and that old roads, as they are repaired, be made correspondingly wide. The day is not far distant when about 80 percent of the roads now in use in this country will be unable to carry safely and speedily the amount of traffic that will be seeking to use them.

Were our own Columbia River Highway built to accommodate more traffic, it is hard to say just how many more thousands of cars daily would traverse it. A short time ago, we crossed on a ferry at The Dalles to the Washington shore. Five cars, after reaching the Washington side, headed westward on the new North Bank Highway.

Nor is the Columbia River Highway devoid of traffic. Last Sunday for curiosity sake, while driving to Portland via the Columbia River Highway route, we counted 740 cars met on the 64 miles between Hood River city limits and 82nd street, the Portland city boundary.

It is a good point for our road-builders to keep in mind—this road-building for the future. It will be to the interest of the taxpayers, in the long run, to build wide roads from now on, and to make the old ones wider as quickly as convenient. Then the job won't have to be done twice, at twice the cost.
