Weaver Birds of Africa Rank as Best Architects

Three habitat groups of African birds in Field Museum of Natural History, Chicago, include village weaver-birds, birds of Mount Cameroon and Kalahari desert birds.

Weavers, which constitute the largest and most varied bird family of Africa, rank among the best architects of the feathered world, and the village weaver-birds are among the most skillful nest builders of their family. Their globe-shaped nests are woven from strips of grass or palm leaves. "Woven" is not a loosely used term, but an accurate description of the method employed by the birds.

Detailed studies of the nests of another weaver species have revealed that certain definite knots are used to tie the ends of the strips of material—they are not merely tucked in. A firmly woven vertical ring about six inches in diameter is first made by the birds to serve a foundation. The hemispherical chamber for the eggs and young is then added on one side, and the down-turned spout or entrance is added on the other.

The village weaver-birds exemplify a highly gregarious mode of living coupled with a peculiar preference for association with conditions imposed by the existence of socially organized human life. Rather than remain exposed to purely natural conditions involving greater dangers from predatory animals, they build their colonies or "villages" of as many as a hundred nests in trees near the villages of human natives. This habit accounts for the name that has been applied to them. These birds occur over a wide area of western and central Africa.

Automobile registrations set an all-time record in Sweden last year.

Cascade Packing House Consumed by Flames

Fire which broke out at 9 o'clock Tuesday night completely destroyed a Hood River packing house of the Apple Growers Association at 5th and Cascade Streets. The blaze of undetermined origin started near the office in the south end of the building and was well under way before discovered. After a half hour it appeared that the flames were under control and it was believed then that half of the building could be saved. Then the fire broke out anew and developed to such proportions that by 10:30 o'clock firemen were forced to fight the conflagration from considerable distance because of the intense heat.

The AGA cannery to the south, the Cascade Pontiac shop and salesrooms on the east, the Cavenah Lumber Co yards on the south and the Arden Farms Creamery on the west were thought to be in considerable danger. Fire trucks and crews from White Salmon and Bingen reinforced the local crew, and as the warehouse flames shot skyward, firemen fought to save the adjoining buildings. However, the fire spent itself and with the roof burned, the flames were boxed in the cement walls which remained standing. There was no wind and spectators spoke praise for the work of the firemen in saving nearby structures.

The warehouse, used as a receiving, washing and packing station, was valued at $50,000, while washers and packing equipment were estimated to be worth a similar sum. Stored in the warehouse were large quantities of lugs, box shook, and between 200 and 300 barrels of brined cherries. Total loss was estimated by W. Q. Bateman, manager of the association, at $250,000. Insurance covers the loss.

Constructed in 1926, the warehouse was a wood structure with concrete walls, 200 feet by 200 feet, two stories high at the south end, and four stories high at the north. The covered overhead run-way connecting the building with the cannery remained intact.

Fire hoses played on all sides of the building but seemed to have little effect on the flames which became intense as the big timbers, the walls, the flooring and the wooden contents of the building were consumed.

Electric power was cut off as a safety measure and Hood River was in darkness for an hour and a half.
