(Continued from Page One) at Bonneville in charge of the fishways report that the large clusters of eels seen on the ladders in afternoons or evenings are all gone by mornings, and by noon another school starts lining the ladders apparently waiting to go on upstream "in a body."

An outstanding feature of the salmon situation at the new fishways is that there is no evidence of presence of fish in the pools below the ladders. It seems, engineers state, that the salmon are having no trouble finding the ladders, or in negotiating the rise to the higher river level.

Pine Beetle Scourge Wanes Survey Shows

Damage by the western pine beetle, dread scourge of valuable timber tracts in eastern Oregon and Washington, has passed its peak and is definitely on the decline, according to a survey recently announced by F. P. Keen of the U. S. Bureau of Entomology and plant quarantine at Portland.

The survey, covering all commercial stands of ponderosa pine, embracing over ten million acres in Oregon and Washington, was conducted by the U. S. Forest Service on national forests, the Indian service for Indian lands, and the Bureau of Entomology, working in cooperation with private owners for private lands. The most severely infested areas have been in Klamath, Lake, Crook, and Harney counties in Oregon, and Yakima and Klickitat counties in Washington the survey shows.

Keen states that from a peak loss of 1,700,000,000 board feet of ponderosa pine in 1932 the loss from western pine beetles dropped to a low of 350 million board feet in 1936, and estimates that not more than 400 million board feet were killed in 1937. Beetle losses in ponderosa pine during the five year period, 1932-1936, were approximately as great as the pine saw mill cut in the two states for that period. Unfortunately, the beetle killed timber is so quickly damaged by sap stain and is scattered over such wide areas that salvage of the trees is ordinarily not practicable.

FLOWERING LANDSCAPE PRAISED

Visitors at the Bonneville project Sunday were loud in their praise of the flower beds that line the roadway near the entrance to the reservations. Profuse blooming of rhododendron and tulips aroused the most comment from passers-by.
