EVERYONE AT FAULT BUT THEMSELVES

The salmon didn't come up the river this spring and the observers on the sidelines are playing the roles of skeptics, optimists, and prophets of doom.

Dams, muddy water, stream pollution, depleted forests, pilchards, and even sportsmen with hook and line have been blamed.

Most pronounced of the critics are the Astoria fishermen, who, living on the fat of the sea, are always pointing the accusing finger upstream.

It was the Astoria fishermen who succeeded in wiping the occasional up-river fish wheels out of existence, while their purse seines and gill nets scooped up the passing fish by the million.

It was the Astoria fishermen who have damned the dams because they would restrict the travel of migrating fish and grind up the fingerlings in their turbines.

And it is the Astoria fishermen who have operated trollers off the coast, and placed a barricade of nets across the river's mouth to almost prohibit any fish from passing upstream.

They have been powerful political influences—these Astoria fishermen, who also try to prohibit fishing above tide water, but who come up themselves to try to ensnare what few salmon manage to escape their ingenious devices and get part way upstream,

Now it is the Astoria fisherman, who, with mystery in their voices are asking, "What has become of the salmon?" Blah!

CASCADE LOCKS—THE EXAMPLE

The town of Cascade Locks, which the Hood River Sun has been pointing to as an example of progressive spirit with its group of wide-awake citizens who are always opportunists, has come in for some favorable comment from another Mid-Columbia city. The Dalles Optimist last week had the following to say for Cascade Locks

"Just recently the lively little town of Cascade Locks qualified for some front page publicity when it was the first northwest community to buy power from Bonneville. While other towns down in the Willamette valley were being warned that they'd burn their fingers if they played with power, and while older and more sedate communities of the Mid-Columbia, prideful of our past and more than half reluctant to change the status quo, have looked with suspicious eyes on Bonneville power, Cascade Locks has gone ahead and dickered for a slice.

"Say what you please, the town by the dam has many of the attributes of a progressive and successful city. It isn't scared to death to depart from some of the precedents of its past; it is being run by young men who were attracted by the opportunity to "get in on the ground floor," and they are doing things. Indeed, they might teach some of the rest of us, who have much larger and more alluring opportunities, a thing or two."

JUNE GRADUATES

Following a custom they've carried out for many years, at this time of year, your editors in all sections of the country, are paying their respects to the spring graduate. They refer to the responsibilities that come with manhood and maturity, the foundations that are to be laid for a future in a world upset by economic and social problems, and the conquering of independence and maintenance. The youngster of today is the man of tomorrow but a man who will need a helping hand.

The present day graduate looks on the event with intelligence and good, common sense despite the fact that there is much facing him to discourage him and make him afraid. Today's graduate knows that getting a diploma is one thing and getting a job another. And it seems that each new crop of graduates finds the task more difficult each year. You will find that most young folks are looking on life more seriously and planning for the future more carefully than is usual with youth. Today's graduate knows the conditions awaiting him are not to be easily solved but he is willing to tackle the problem. Many graduates have been led to believe there are no longer opportunities for pleasant profitable and helpful service, but they will find there is always an opportunity to serve.

Of these many young people who are soon starting in to find employment, most of them being willing to take any kind of honest labor, are paying the way, in part, for the general support of their families, and in some cases they will be able to lighten the load on our relief rolls. They are deserving of all the aid and cooperation our local citizens can extend them. Do not let any boy remain idle who has a desire to work, if you can help him in any way. The wish to work instead of loaf is a characteristic which deserves the encouragement of the older generation in every possible way.

THEY COME BACK

No one ever outgrows his boyhood. If he was born and grew up in a rugged, hill country he will have traces of that country in his soul to the balance of his days. The man from Texas can never be like the man from Vermont—there are always boyhood ties they cannot sever. That's why local residents are glad when those who were born and reared around here come back for a visit. That's why the hand of welcome is always extended them—we know that there is something worth while in a heart that always retains a respect and veneration for the place in which childhood's days were spent. Maybe we are not growing up as fast as the big cities in which they now make their homes; but that doesn't matter. The man or woman whose heart is right comes back to see the places and faces they first loved. Since it gladdens their hearts and gives them happiness, then we are all glad, in a way, that the place of their birth hasn't changed so much.

What has become of the old-fashioned politician who spent the public's money as reluctantly as he did his own?

Another advantage of living here instead of in a big city is that you don't have to wear out a pair of shoes here running out to see if the police have put a ticket on your car.

The world may be getting smarter, but a lot of fishermen will rock the boat this summer just the same.

"THINGS UNDONE"

Have I left any words unspoken today,
That would lighten the heart that was sad?
Have I given something from my knowledge in store
That would cheer and make some one glad?

Have I left any debts unpaid today
That were called for when due?
Have I got the money that others should have,
Like some folks that I knew?

Have I left any letters unanswered today,
That were sent from friends far away?

Are they anxiously waiting on me just now?
Do they expect a letter today?

Have I left any loved ones at home alone?
Am I sailing the wide, wide sea?

Are they looking each day for my return?
Are they anxiously waiting for me?
—I. N. Bradford.

Silo Silas Sez . . .

The average man is familiar with the picture of Gen. Grant but he didn't acquire that familiarity from seeing it on Uncle Sam's $10,000 bills.

It isn't the people who want something for nothing that's causing all the trouble, it's the ones that have succeeded in gettin' it.

The trouble with most men who insist on fair play is that they also want to be the umpire.

Everything works smoothly in the average family until the husband decides to stay home at the same time his wife decides to go out.

Mules and men are two things that never make any headway while they are kicking.
