Mount Hood History

Facts about Mt. Hood as published in a small pamphlet in 1907

Mount Hood, as seen from Portland, appears to terminate at the summit in a sharp point. Such, however, is not the case, as the present summit is the irregular north rim of a crater that once existed in a complete circle to the couth, making a mountain in form similar to St. Helens. In course of time the south, east and west portions of this rim disappeared, leaving a long, irregular, jagged portion to the north, at right angles to Portland. After the southerly walls of the crater disappeared, a rock several hundred feet in height was left in the center of the old crater, now known as Crater Rock. As the volcanic heat decreased, snow accumulated above this rock, formed glaciers, and moved slowly down to right and left, thus forming a sharp ridge, called the Devil's Backbone, the Hog Back, or the Big Backbone. As these glaciers moved down they left the north wall of the original crater, thus forming the Great Cravasse.

Mount Hood is located in latitude 45 deg. 22 min. and 24.3 sec.; longitude 121 deg. 42 min. and 49.6 sec., and is one of the very few snow-capped peaks in the world that stands alone, rising directly from sea level, and visible from a city of nearly 200,000 population. It was known among Indians as Pat-to (accent on the last syllable.) Many years ago Dr. Mm. McKay explained to the writer the significance of the word "Patta," which was originally applied to Mount Hood, but other mountains were sometimes referred to as Patto. It means great, high, snow-covered mountain.

On October 29, 1792, Lieutenant Broughton, of Vancouver's exploring expedition, discovered it, and named it in honor of Lord Hood, of England, a personal friend of Captain Vancouver. During the '40's there was an effort made by Americans to fix the name of Presidents to the various high peaks of the Cascades, and to permanenly designate them all as the Presidents' Range. At this time Hood was known as Mt. Washington. On several occasions since whites occupied the country it is said to have been in eruption; especially in 1846 and in 1865. At the present time it constantly emits steam, and at times black sulphurous smoke, in limited quantities. On the south side there are numerous caves under the glaciers, created in this monner: The side of the side of the mountain being warm, the ice next to it gradually melts away, until, at times it rises irregularly six to ten feet from the ground. This melting from below continues until the suppoorts are not able to withstand the great weight, when there is a grinding and settling of broken ice as the great mass tumbles to the earth; then the process of melting and freezing continues until the entire glacier is again a solid mass of ice. This is repeated through the summer months, and were it not for the replenishing snows of winter, the southern slope of Mount Hood would soon be free from glaciers.
