FOR WOMAN'S HONOR.

He heard earnest men like Benjamin Scott, the city chamberlain, and women like Ellice Hopkins and Josephine Butler say so; the latter descended from those heroic Christians who were driven out of France by the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Home secretaries and heads of police had known it for years but with a horrible indifference. In an interview with an ex-head of the criminal investigation department he was bewildered with the statements of what had actually come under that gentleman's knowledge when in office, and exclaimed, "But do you think that these things are going on now?" "Yes, now, every night." "Why," he said, "it is enough to raise hell, and I shall at least make it raise England."

After having satisfied himself that "the half had not been told," he at once proceeded to make the necessarily horrible revelation—"The Maiden Tribute of Modern Babylon"—in which he opened doors which had hitherto been closed; threw back shutters; drew curtains; and let pitying Christian eyes see the sights over which voluptuous Londoners were nightly gloating. And England shrieked, "Indecent!" as if subjects like these ever could be made decent. Mr. Stead did not want to make such things decent, for to do this would be a horrible lie to the facts as they had been burned in his own brain. Revolting reading, reading to harrow and madden its readers—that was his aim—and London, amazed, staggered and stupefied, could not stand this, though fornication it had long stood! And for a few days by the noise the clubs and the papers made, great seemed Harlot Diana of the Ephesians. It would have amazed them to have seen him sitting reading their leaders and to have heard his kindly conclusion of the whole matter as he laid their papers down and said with a pleasant undisturbed smile, "They are all wrong; they'll get right some day." Then, after days which seemed to them years, the purest, most heroic of the women of England, in a long and splendid memorial, spoke to him, thanked him, blessed him, and put the chaplet of such honor as their homage could give upon his abused head. We have a "Modern Babylon" not so far removed from us as London, on whose principal business streets where men are obliged to pass daily is the gilded saloon and its accompanying brothel; and have we not a William Stead in all America? Among all of our noble, good men, is there not one whom God has taught to count the right as duty; one who will lay aside all considerations of worldly wisdom; and ask the question, "How can I help?" Men's affairs have long enough had their turn, now the full time has come for the turn of dishonored girlhood and wronged. Here is slavery and tragedy enough, and it will have to be made known in some way, for as surely as God reigns in heaven, he will some day arise, and the tormented creatures whom he created and cares for will be avenged. This revolt against impurity and crime is yours, can you as Christian men refuse to lead the way and guide the movement? Can a deliverer promise not to run because there are dangers in his way? Can a patriot refuse to enter a battle-field because bullets fly thick as hailstones, and maybe it will be reddened with his blood, when on his one sword some great issue depends?

In Mr. Stead worked the loves and woes which moved Isaiah's graphic pen and lost John the Baptist his head. To do the work that he did we must begin as he did—at the fountain head. You must lay down as a great political principle that no man who believes that the daughters of the poor must be sacrificed to the lusts of his own sex is fit to help make the laws of our nation. You must raise the standard of political opinion until it becomes impossible for an immoral man to occupy any public position in this country, from the police station to the president of the United States. It is horrible that men whose office it is to put down crimes will do nothing to put down this crime. "Let it alone," they practically say, and they have said the same in many ways, and have said it for years. We all have our part in this, and in Shakespeare's genial words, "God fights upon our side and our good cause."
