tied strings around the bottoms of our trousers and around our coat sleeves at the wrists, as a precaution against the sort of game we were after. Before long we came upon one of the little hillocks of twigs which form the ants' houses. Jean held his bag open by the ant-hill, and Denis simply gave two or three strokes with his shovel, thrusting ants, twigs and eggs all pellmell into the bag. The sack was quickly tied up, and another ant-hill sought and despoiled, and this was repeated until the bag was full.

We proceeded to a level clearing in the woods, open to the sun, in the middle of which there was a ring made of empty flower-pots laid on their sides, the mouths of the pots turned toward the center. Jean laid down his bag, with its thousands of squirming prisoners, while he covered the ring of flower-pots over with the green branches of trees in such a way as to shade them completely, but not the middle of the circle. Then, into this sunny space in the center, he opened his bag and emptied its contents. Instantly, as if by inspiration, the writhing mass of ants began carrying their eggs into the shaded pors. They knew that, if left many minutes exposed to the sun, their delicate young ones would certainly die, and they deposited the lavæ in the pots as fast as they could carry them. Before long some of the pots were half filled with nothing but eggs, and these pots Denis emptied, one at a time, into a smaller bag. While the ants continued to work at the rescue of their eggs from the broiling sun, Jean returned to the woods, and came back at length with still another bag full of his strangely mixed material, which he poured into the writhing arena. Denis, in the meantime, continued steadily at work emptying the flower-pots white with
