only ran when the enemy was almost near enough to grab his pigtatl. I have referred to the barbarous nature of the Mongol and give the following instance to illustrate it: One day an infantry soldier was missing, and it was at once suspected that the man had been killed. After a diligent search he was found on the following day, his arms and legs outstretched and pinioned to the ground with pointed bamboo sticks. One stick was driven through the palm of each hand, another one through his breast and one through his feet, which were crossed. His face and other parts of his body were covered with unslaked lime, which had burned deep holes into the flesh. The most common way in China of killing an

It is very seldom that a Chinaman will fight man to man, but he will attack his antagonist when the majority is on his side. During the battle of Dong Dong 12,000 Chinese soldiers attacked 900 Frenchmen and were only driven back by shrapnel. The assault was repeated five times, but it was not until the Mongols lost 5000 men that they desisted. Americans and Europeans are apt to look upon the Chinese soldier as a little fellow as harmless and puny as the ordinary laundryman, but this is a great mistake.
