VITRIOLIC RIFLES.

The New Civilizing Agent Which Science Presents to War. The forward movement of civilization has been compared to march of an army. Sometimes this comparison fails and civilization may better be said to be rushing onward like a race horse, clearing ditches and hedges at a single bound, not even stopping for apparently impassable streams. The present may be rightly put down as one of those times, and we may add that civilization has just successfully taken an eight rail fence and today is bounding away on the other side, kicking its heels in the air and covering twenty feet at every jump. To the youthful
