

A True Heart.
Red are the lips of my darling, my dear,
Sweet are the lips of my own;
Love like a bee at her budding mouth lips,
Drunk with passion before he has flown.
But oh, and oh,
Red lips will pale some day,
While a true heart lasts for aye.

Gray are the eyes of my darling, my dear,
Bright are the eyes of my own;
Fond as the dreaming of tropical skies,
Glad as the rivulet's midsummer sheen.
But oh, and oh,
Bright eyes will dim some day,
While a true heart lasts for aye.

Brown is this tress of my darling, my dear,
Slinken this tress of my fair;
Brown with a hint of the sun's tenderness
Twined in the strands of her beautiful hair.
But oh, and oh,
Sweet locks will fall some day,
While a true heart lasts for aye.

Prairie belong to my darling, my dear,
Love is but due to my sweet;
So here I pluck from the garden of her feet,
This tiny blossom to give at her feet.
But oh, and oh,
Beauty will fade some day,
While a true heart lasts for aye.

When the officers of the garrison mounted the hill before them and surveyed the place where their fort had been, there was not one of them who had sufficient command of himself to write a report of what had happened. They gazed at the bare, staring flatness of the shore bluff, and they looked at each other. This was not war. It was something supernatural, awful. They were not frightened; they were oppressed and appalled. But the military discipline of their minds soon exerted its force, and a brief account of the terrific event was transmitted to the authorities, and Sergt. Kilsby was sentenced to a month in the guard house.

No one approached the vicinity of the bluff where the fort had stood, for danger might not be over; but every possible point of observation within a safe distance was soon crowded with anxious and terrified observers. A feeling of awe was noticeable everywhere. If people could have had a tangible idea of what had occurred, it would have been different. If the sea had raged; if a vast body of water had been thrown into the air, if a dense cloud had been suddenly ejected from the surface of the earth, they might have formed some opinion about it. But the instantaneous disappearance of a great fortification with a little more appreciable accompaniment than the sudden tap, as of a little hammer, upon thousands of window panes, was something which their intellects could not grasp. It was not the ordinary kind of explosion which the ordinary mind could appreciate the difference between the action of an instantaneous motor when imbedded in rocks and earth, and its effect, when opposed by nothing but stone walls, upon or near the surface of the earth.

Early the next morning the little fleet of the syndicate prepared to carry out its further orders. The waters of the lower bay were entirely deserted, and the ordinary mind could appreciate the difference between the action of an instantaneous motor when imbedded in rocks and earth, and its effect, when opposed by nothing but stone walls, upon or near the surface of the earth.

States, or a capture or attack upon an American vessel, navy or commercial, by a British man-of-war, or an attack upon an American port by British vessels, the city would be bombarded and destroyed.

This message, which was of course instantly transmitted to London, placed the British government in the apparent position of being held by the throat by the American War Syndicate. But if the British government or the people of England or Canada recognized this position at all it was merely as a temporary condition. In a short time the most powerful men-of-war of the royal navy, as well as a fleet of transports carrying troops, would reach the coasts of North America, and then the condition of affairs would rapidly be changed. It was absurd to suppose that a few merchant vessels, however heavily armored, or a few new fangled submarine machines, however destructive they might be, could withstand an armada of the largest and finest armored vessels in the world. A ship or two might be disabled, although this was unlikely, now that the new method of attack was understood; but it would soon be the ports of the United States, on both the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, which would lie under the guns of an enemy.

But it was not in the power of their navy that the British government and the people of England and Canada placed their greatest trust, but in the incapacity of their petty foe to support its ridiculous assumptions. The British chain of title city lay under the guns of the American syndicate was considered ridiculous, for few people believed that these vessels had any guns. Certainly there had been evidence that any shots had been fired from them. In the opinion of reasonable people the destruction of the forts and the explosions in the harbor had been caused by mines—mines of a new and terrible kind, which were the work of traitors and confederates. The destruction of the lighthouse had strengthened this belief, for its fall was similar to that which would have been occasioned by a great explosion under its foundation.

But however terrifying and appalling had been the results of the explosion of these mines, it was not thought probable that there were any more of them. The explosions had taken place at exposed points distant from the city, and the most careful investigation failed to discover any present signs of mining operations.

This theory of mines worked by confederates was received throughout the civilized world, and was universally condemned. Even in the United States the alliance between the syndicate and British traitors that there was reason to believe that a popular pressure would be brought to bear upon the government sufficient to force it to break its contract with the syndicate and to carry on the war with the national army and navy. The crew was considered an admirable specimen of the strength of a man, but mine under a fort, laid and fired by perfidious confederates, was considered unworthy an enlightened people.

The members of the syndicate now found themselves in an embarrassing and dangerous position; a position in which they were placed by the universal incredulity regarding the instantaneous motor, and unless they could make the world believe that they were using a motor bomb, the war could not be prosecuted on the plan proposed.

It was easy enough to convince the enemy of the terrible destruction the syndicate had effected, but to make that enemy and the world understand that this was done by bombs, which could be used in one place as well as another, was difficult indeed. They had to be made to believe that the syndicate at a certain time a bomb should be projected into a certain fort. Precisely at the specified time the fort had been destroyed, but nobody believed that a bomb had been projected into the fort.

Every opinion, official or popular, concerning what it had done and what might be expected of it, was promptly forwarded to the syndicate by its agents, and it was not long before it was plainly indicated that the effect had been produced had not been produced. Unless the enemy could be made to understand that any fort or ships within the harbor had been destroyed, the syndicate could not be made to understand that the syndicate had been destroyed, but nobody believed that a bomb had been projected into the fort.

A JUDICIAL DESPOT.

UP, FOR THE OFFICE OF ATTORNEY GENERAL.

He Believes in the Divine Rights of Judges to Fine and Imprison Those Who Criticize His Actions.

In its issue of December 12, 1889, THE VALLEY RECORD of Ashland made a sharp criticism of the management of the First judicial district of Oregon, over which Lionel R. Webster presides as judge. The next day Judge Webster's grievously offended party in the court room at Jacksonville, sixteen miles from Ashland, in his own handwriting, issued the following, to wit:

IN THE CIRCUIT COURT FOR JACKSON COUNTY, OREGON.
WHEREAS E. J. Kaiser and N. A. Jacobs are editors and publishers of the VALLEY RECORD, a newspaper published at Jacksonville, Jackson County, Oregon, on Thursday the 12th day of December, 1889, in an issue of said newspaper, published on said day, they published an article containing a libelous and untrue statement of the facts concerning the management of the First judicial district of Oregon, over which Lionel R. Webster presides as judge. The next day Judge Webster's grievously offended party in the court room at Jacksonville, sixteen miles from Ashland, in his own handwriting, issued the following, to wit:

The circuit judge has ordered an investigation to be made of the conduct of the said newspaper in a criminal case in which his important testimony was needed to establish the innocence of the defendant. It might not be more than common justice to the defendant, and the business of investigation itself and everybody else connected with the management and publication of the said newspaper, to be held responsible for the same. If the defendant is found guilty of the crime charged against him, the court will order the said newspaper to pay the costs of the trial, and to be held responsible for the same. If the defendant is found innocent, the court will order the said newspaper to pay the costs of the trial, and to be held responsible for the same.

The appearance early on a summer morning of a large British cruiser off the mouth of the harbor filled those two commanders with uncontrollable belligerency. That in time of a vessel of the size of the Lenox and Stockbridge, two of the finest cruisers in the service, and commanded by two of the most restless and bravest officers of the American navy.
