LAPAYETTE.

I suppose that in accordance with ancien reduced the observance of the first day of annary into ancient Gaul and Brittain, rom whence it has spread into the United sates and other countries, and became genrally adopted throughout all Europe, in the arrly part of the 18th century. Now as cuspum and convenience requires some point of eparture from which to reckon time, and a that point is fixed on the first day of Jansry, therefore on that day, or more propertary, therefore on that day, or more proper-y speaking, at the beginning of the day we call time one year older, and exclaim for the future "A happy New Year," and so say we all, not only one, but many a successive "Happy New Year."

Jan. 1, 1884. usage I must say "A Happy New Year to hit." But why this eminently proper wish should be expressed on the 1st day of January any more than on any other day, is a ary may more than or any other day, is a question that I cannot answer, for certainly every day is the first day of the new year, counting from that day. Then why take the first of January in preference to all other rist of January in preference to all other lays? The only way we can account for the astom, is to say that we derived it from the komans, who seem to have adopted the first ay of January as the legal beginning of the ear, and can be traced back some two or bree hundred years before our present era. The custom of celebrating the first of the car seems to belong to all nations, by some a merry making, feasting and gifts; while there make it an occasion of purely religious ceromonies. But while all celebrated New Years," it must be understood that ntil lately no two celebrated it the same ay.
