HOT SPRINGS LEGEND.

THE BIG CHIEF'S GRATITUDE SHOWN IN A STRANGE INSCRIPTION.

"Thunder of the Blue Mountains" lived Too High and Contained the Gout-A Squaw of One Hundred Summers Gave Him a Friendly Tip, and He Followed It. I cannot undertake to say how many ages ago it all happened, writes a correspondent of the Boston Herald from Hot Springs, N. C., but it fell out once upon a time that the great Cherokee chief, Say-on-Katche-hi, which may be translated "Thunder of the Blue Mountains," having lain out on his back with friendly moonshiners beyond the point of prudence, was seized by a painful and irritating attack of rheumatic gout. The medicine men gave him every remedy on the theory that the hair of the dog cures the bite, and when this treatment proved of no avail they dosed the stricken warrior with pieces of rattlesnake's tails, bears' claws, stick bait, eyes of old toad and frog, all gathered at midnight in the full of the moon while the catamounts searched for the dusky shadows of the balsam woods.

Yet the chief grew worse, and when hope was abandoned a withered squaw who had seen more than three centuries brought hope to his worshippers with the tale that when she was in her teens she had heard an ancient squaw say that some existed, many miles southward, in the springs of water which bubbled hot from the bowels of the steaming earth, and that bathing therein would health and strength and youth restore. Say-on-Katche-hi tried to jump at the chance, but the effort stung his painful feet, however, having obtained the directions, he set out on his journey to the hot springs, and ere nightfall he was on his way southward, bearing in a litter on the shoulders of his young men. Over mountain and through valley they kept their course, and at last they came to a broad river flowing southward. They promptly crossed it, and which was fastened to a bush on the river bank, and thence, after the fashion of gentlemen described in Xenophon's "Anabasis," of which I have some faint recollection, they journeyed various states until they reached a place where, even at midday, clouds of steam were rising from the earth and low pools of strange aspect patched the drear plateau.

The chief was lifted from the boat, his trousers, tunic and other garments soon stripped from his royal person, and he was quickly immersed in a warm spring. "This feels good," said the chief, "this feels good." And with content he lay on the needles of the pine trees on Round Top and the leaves of the oaks on Lovers' Leap.

The chief passed the greater part of seven days in the pool, drank deep of the waters and did not recover so rapidly as he would have done if he had been contentedly, but at last he regained the use of his crippled limbs, the gout left him, and he was soon able to walk around and notice the things about him.

After one or two moons he said to his retainers, "I prefer to live here than to die elsewhere, and I return to my old home. My fathers to gather my goods and chattels and remove hither in due course." So he started home, and when he reached the forks of the road, about 30 degrees from the spring, he spied the besting cliff now known as Paint rock, which resembles the chimneys in Mr. Jules Verne's story of "The Mysterious Island." There he halted, and on the face of the cliff wrote the strange inscription which is still visible.

Scientists and archaeologists have studied it in vain, and it is only recently that my learned friend, Dr. Tasson, has deciphered it. He scraped away the limestone which had made the carving firm upon the page of stone and read as follows: "Which water, 7 miles—read as big chief. This is not only a valuable guide, but it is a great historic interest. Say-on-Katche-hi and his tribe returned, and for many years they held the fort where the steaming springs bubble, and there was never a case of sickness in the Indian village.

So much by way of introduction to Hot Springs, N. C., which must not be confounded with Hot Springs, Ark. This place whereof I wrote used to appear as Warm Springs on the map, and it is a pity that the name was changed.

There are 106 springs in the hotel park of 300 acres, and the temperature of these thermal waters varies from 99 degrees to 104 degrees. The original baths were rude and plain, but the rheumatic, gouty, nervous or dyspeptic victim who now comes here for rest and health, is not obliged to lie in the mud as did Say-on-Katche-hi of ancient memory, but steps into a delicious pool, floors it with his feet, and is marbled, and when he has his bath is safely laid away upon a cot in his own retiring room, where he sinks usually into a deep and dreamless slumber, and awakes refreshed and rested. A peculiarity of the waters is that the baths are not erupting, and in spite of the low temperature for drinking purposes are not in the least nauseating. It is said that the hotel is kept in Broadway by the use of crutches left behind by happy patients, and in which truthful narrative I do not care to vouch for it.

The Employed Strategy.

The young husband was somewhat surprised when his wife came into the office. She opened the conversation by saying, "I want enough money to go out of town for a few days," she said, "and you will have to take your meals down town for a month."

"Why, what does this mean?"

"It means just this: I got a messenger boy to come to the house for my trunk, and he said she was wanted at her aunt's, and as soon as she got around the corner I shut up the house and locked it and ran away. When she comes back she won't find any one there. We don't owe her anything, so it's all right, and I wanted to discharge her, but you know I never would dare to tell her to go, and if you wouldn't care, don't you think your little wife knows pretty well to manage? Say yes, now, or I'll break her and cry right here in the office."—Indianapolis Journal.

WOMEN OF THE FUTURE.

A Darwinian Philosopher's Views on Coming Natural Selection.

I believe that improvement will be effected through the agency of female choice in marriage. As things are, women are constantly forced into marriage for a bare livelihood or a comfortable home. They have practically no choice in the selection of their partners and the fathers of their children, and so long as this economic necessity for marriage prevails upon the great bulk of women, men who are vicious, degraded, feeble intellect and unsound body will secure wives, and thus often
