CREOSOTING TIMBER.

At the time of visiting the Southern Pacific company's wood preserving works at Cornelius last week, the first charge had not been drawn, and the superintendent could not certainly tell how our timber would act. It might prove to be refractory and it might take the treatment readily. Now the works are in comolete working order and our fir lumber is proving its excellence in another direction, that of being easy retained after being injected with zinc chloride, and that every wood is there any guess work.
