After these preliminaries, Kit McGee repeated the oath-and a particularly blasphemous and blood cardling oath it was-a few words at a time, the candidate echoing them after him in a firm voice. The penalty attached to the violation of this obligation was a form of death that was as shocking as it was novel, but the young man did not flinch. When the oath was concluded, the bandage was suddenly pulled from his eyes, and looking up he saw three rifles leveled at his breast, while the men about him shouted out:
