By VIOLA ROSEBORO.

[Copyright, 1892, by the Century Company.] It was a sunny May morning, and the Baltic was steaming out of New York bay for Liverpool. It was the old ship's last trip in these waters, and she made it under special conditions. She was given up entirely to second class passengers, who, of course, as a result, had in some respects first class accommodations. The consequence was a social mixture perhaps a shade odder and more varied than is usually seen. Two weeks before my friend Miss Milman had happened to see this arrangement advertised, and we had suddenly and happily liscovered that at the rates given we could afford to drop work (our painting and writing) for a mouth or two and together "run over to the other side."

We were on deck in that May sunshine, our hands full of flowers-for our friends had graciously ignored our lowly second class estate in their farewells -the bright waters dancing around us. the workaday world behind us, enchanted lands of romance and beauty before us, and at our elbows a new and heteroshe would have me out, and then she geneous representation of the dear, dull, supremely interesting human race.
