The Sheriff of Siskyou.

By BRET HARTE.

and brought out a rich, silver mounted cut glass drinking flask, which he handed to the stranger. "I say!" said the half breed admir-

ingly. "Yours?"
"Certainly." "Certainly now-but before, eh?" Rule No. 2 may have indicated that references to the past held no dishonor. The major, although accustomed to these pleasantries, laughed a little harshly. "Mine always," he said. "But you don't drink?" The half breed's face darkened under its grime. "Wot yo're givin us? I've been filled chock up by Simpson over thar. I reckon I know when I've got a load on." "Were you ever in Sacramento?" "Yes.

"When?"

"Last week." "Did you hear anything about me?" The half breed glanced through his tangled hair at the major in some wonder, not only at the question, but at the almost childish eagerness with which it was asked. "I didn't hear much of anything

25 35 alse," he answered grimly. "And-what did they say?" "Said you'd got to be took anyhow. They allowed the new sheriff would do

The major laughed. "Well, you heard how the new sheriff did it-skunked away with his whole posse before oneeighth of my men. You saw how the rest of this camp held up your nine troopers and that sapheaded cub of a 28 65 lieutenant, didn't you? You wouldn't have been standing here if you hadn't. No. There isn't the civil process nor 17 90 the civil power in all California that can take me out of this camp.'

But neither his previous curiosity nor present bravado seemed to impress the ragged stranger with much favor. He 80 glanced sulkily around the cabin and began to shuffle toward the door. "Stop! Where are you going to? Sit down. I want to talk to you.' The fugitive hesitated for a moment and then dropped ungraciously on the edge of a camp stool near the door. The major looked at him. "I may have to remind you that I run this camp, and the boys hereabouts do 60 pretty much as I say. What's your name?" "Tom." "Tom? Well, look here, Tom! D-n 85 it all! Can't you see that when a man is stuck here alone, as I am, he wants 4 15 to know what's going on outside and hear a little fresh talk?" The singular weakness of this blend 3 45 ed command and appeal apparently struck the fugitive curiously. He fixed 35 his lowering eyes on the major as if in gloomy doubt if he were really the reckless desperado he had been represented. That this man-twice an assassin and the ruler of outlaws as reckless as himself-should approach him in this half confidential way evidently puzzled him.

"Wot you wanter know?" he asked gruffly. "Well, what's my party saying or doing about me?" said the major impatiently. "What's The Express saying about me?" "I reckon they're throwing off on you all round. They allow you never represented the party, but worked for yourself," said the man shortly. Here the major lashed out. A set of traitors and hirelings! He had bought and paid for them all. He had sunk $2,000 in The Express and saved the editor from being horsewhipped and jailed for libel. Half the cursed bonds that they were making such a blanked fuss about were handled by these hypocrites, blank them! They were a low lived crew of thieves and deserters. It is presumed that the major had forgotten himself in this infelicitous selection of epithets, but the stranger's face only relaxed into a grim smile. More than that, the major had apparently forgot-75 ten his desire to hear his guest talk, for he himself at once launched into an elaborate exposition of his own affairs and a specious and equally elaborate defense and justification of himself and denunciation of his accusers. For nearly half an hour he reviewed step by step and detail by detail the charges against him, with plausible explana-15 tion and sophistical argument—always with a singular prolixity and reiteration that spoke of incessant consciousness and self abstraction. Of that dashing self sufficiency which had dazzled his friends and awed his enemies there was no trace. At last even the set smile of the degraded recipient of these confidences darkened with a dull, bewildered disgust. Then, to his relief, a step was heard without. The major's manner instantly changed. "Well," he demanded impatiently as

Dawson entered. "I came to know what you want done with him," said Dawson, indicating the fugitive with a contemptuous 45 finger. "Take him to your cabin."

"My cabin! Him?" ejaculated Dawson, turning sharply on his chief. The major's light eyes contracted, and his thin lips became a straight line. "I don't think you understand me, Dawson, and another time you'd better wait until I've done. I want you to take him to your cabin and then clear out of wonderful him to your cabin and then clear out of it yourself. You understand? I want him near me and alone." Dawson was not astonished the next morning to see Major Overstone and the half breed walking together down Ame the gully road, for he had already come to the conclusion that the major was purely vegeplanning some extraordinary reprisal against the invaders that would insure the perpetual security of the camp. That he should use so insignificant and unimportant a tool now appeared to him to be quite natural, particularly as the service was probably one in which the man would be sacrificed. "The major," he suggested to his companions, "ain't going to risk a white man's skin when he can get an Injin's hide handy.' The reluctant, hesitating step of the half breed as they walked along seemed to give some color to this hypothesis. He listened sullenly to the major as he pointed out the strategic position of the Bar. "That wagon road is the only approach to Wynyard's, and a dozen men along the rocks could hold it against a hundred. The trail that you came by 80 over the ridge drops straight into this gully, and you saw what that would mean to any blanked fools who might try it. Of course we could be shelled from that ridge if the sheriff had a howitzer or the men also knew how to work one, but even then we could occupy the ridge before them." He paused a moment and then added: "I used to be in the army, Tom. I saw service in Mexico before that cub you got away from had his first trousers. I was brought up as a gentleman—blank it all!—and here I am."
