NESTUCCA BAY. Legend of Sand Cape As Told By Tradition of the Indians. Centuries ago a pirate vessel anchored off the cape for the purpose of repairs. When they came ashore, instead of cutting the necessary timber for the purpose, they camped and gambled and quarreled among themselves, leaving the vessel to its fate. E'er its destruction the captain got all his treasures ashore and buried them. During their stay there the mate fell in love with the captain's daughter, a handsome girl who encouraged his addresses. The captain forbid their intercourse, and one night they stole away, intending to escape over the mountains to the Willamette valley. The father finding they had gone, swore terrible oaths on them, and on the Indians if they did not bring them back, Too well they did his bidding, as they soon returned with bodies bleeding and gory. Remorse now struck the captain, and he buried them in a cave on the north side of the cape, and carved a rude cross over the entrance, and the ocean forever sings the dirges of the murdered pair of lovers. The treasures are supposed to be still buried on the cape near by or in the cave, awaiting the lucky finder, as the Indians never disturb the bodies of the dead, even when treasures were placed near them. The end of the pirate crew is soon told. Cruel and tyrannical to the Indians and themselves, it was but a short time before they came to their death by the hatred of the natives and of one another.
