The Doctor will ever be remembered as the man whose vote in the electoral college in 1876 made Rutherford B. and bitter contest, after Florida, Louisi ana and South Carolina had been award ed to the republicans, Hayes still lacked a majority. This was given to him by the decision of the electoral commission, the day before inauguration in 1877, to accept the certificates of the republican candidates for presidential electors in Oregon. The vote of Oregon was not the only factor in the settlement of the presidential contest of 1876. If the democratic congress of 1876 had not, in a moment of supreme confidence, admitted Colorado to the union, Tilden would have been elected and it would not have made any difference who got Oregon's votes. Patterson, who had been elected to congress in 1874, assured the demo-crats that Colorado, if admitted, would give three votes for the democratic candidate for president in 1876. Colorado held her first state election in the summer of 1876, and, to the consternation of the democrats, went republican. In the presidential campaign of 1876 the republican candidates for presidential electors in Oregon were W. H. Odell, J. W. Watts and J. C. Cartwright. They were lected by good majorities over their democratic opponents. The question of Dr. Watts' eligibility hinged on the fact that he was postmaster at Lafayette for three years prior to his nomination. and under the law governing elections a ederal office-holder may not be a presi dential elector. The election was held November 7th and on the 12th Dr. Watts resigned the postoffice. The democrats filed a protest, raising the question of Watts' eligibility. The republican elec-tors filed a counter protest against interference by Governor Grover. The governor refused to issue a certificate to Watts. Dr. Watts then resigned the office, and the other republican electors immediately elected him to fill the vacancy. The democratic electors then certified their own returns, with the governor behind them, and the republicans with the ballot cast by their electors, supplemented by an abstract of the vote of the state, certified by Secretary Chadwick, under the seal of the state. The action of the electoral commission in giving the state to Hayes and Wheeler s familiar history.

Dr. Watts was always an ardent repub lican, and a very effective campaigner. He took an active part in the last concention held in this county in April,
