Much importance attaches to the dictum of the Papal See in opposition to the organization known as the Knights of Labor. It is nearly two years since the first promulgation of the Pope's condemnation of the order. Since then it has rested in abeyance, pending an appeal. But the original edict has been now affirmed, and the Pope sets the seal of his displeasure upon the Knights, and commands the Bishop to proceed against all Catholics belonging to the order, in the same manner as they have been accustomed to act in the case of members of that church who were also members of other secret societies. The great question among the Knights now is whether the Papal prohibition is meant to apply universally or only to Canada. It is addressed to Cardinal Taschereau, of Quebec, and some church authorities hold that it will have force only under his jurisdiction, and that any edict intended to apply for application in the United States would be addressed to Cardinal Gibbons at Baltimore. However that may be, the language of the edict would seem to indicate that the Pope intends the prohibition to be general. Cardinal Taschereau, in his letter of information to the Bishops, says that "there can no longer be any doubt as to the rule to be followed by the Catholics of the whole world" in the matter. If this interpretation be correct, the edict will surely have a very appreciable political and social effect in this country. The knights of labor movement will be deprived of much of its original force if the Catholics withdraw from it, as they certainly will if brought face to face with a dilemma involving fidelity to their church. A very few may elect to remain faithful to the order, and disobey the papal mandate, but with the vast majority of the Catholics, as is well known, the authority of the church is supreme. Great interest will be felt in the future developments arising out of this significant act.
