

near city, passes by the lovely grounds, that were laid out in front of the luxurious dwelling, terminating in a beautiful park at the foot of the slight descent, protected on either side by a stone wall, giving the place that air of elegant retirement so congenial to the child of luxury; while seated in the veranda that is overrun with Virginia creepers and fragrant honey suckles, looking out upon the lovely grounds that glow with the varied tints of the many peteled flowers, that border the intricate walks, sits a woman gazing, with a far away look in her delicate face, out over the landscape, as though recalling some long hurried memories of the past—her unhappy past. She lives over again in imagination the happy, long, long, ago, before her sun went down to rise no more.

Ah, Harry, my darling, must the shadow of your dear face haunt me forever. Perhaps, if I could have kissed your marble brow, and laid your cold and lifeless form in the quiet grave I might have become reconciled in time to Gods providence; but to think of you always as I last heard from you, weltering in your own precious blood dying far from home, by the hand of the cruel assassin, and doomed to a watery grave, is more than I can bear. God help me, I don't want to cloud the lives of my children, with my selfish grief. They try so hard—heaven bless them—to make me forget my pain; but alas, my wound is incurable. The death angel alone can apply the healing touch. In her pre-occupation she had spoken this last aloud, unconscious of the approach of a light foot
