fern collect even now two million dollars a year from harvests of the three items alone. Much of the picking has been done by trespassers on unprotected property.

Sword fern thrives in the Pacific Northwest. Florists provide its market, which calls for new - growth leaves clean with sharp tips, each at least 25 inches long. The standard bunch has 55 leaves, and 50 bunches are packed to a case.

Tree seeds have never had a better market than they enjoy today. Florists also buy cedar boughs, rhododendrons, moss, Oregon grape, Kinnikinnik and other items of the kind.

While the big plants of the woodland are "fattening up" each year, adding layers of wood, spearing toward the sun, there are tiny timber crops on the farm that may make income.

Even moss and skunk cabbage have market possibilities. Ginseng roots, foxglove, peppermint, wild berries, are also prospects.

Let's get down to earth in the farm woodlands!
