Out of the Woods

By JIM STEVENS

How is the owner of a farm woodlot to "merchandise" his crop? How is the investor in any type of small forest ownership to finance the practice of forestry on his land? On every forest acre of private ownership the first questions are: What wood is salable, where can it be sold, and for how much?

Believe me, and I speak from experience as a three-time small forest land owner, the answers have more bearing on the practice of private forestry in these United States than any other facts that can be brought up.

Forestry must be paid for. It is paid for on publicly owned lands through the collection of taxes and their disbursement by government agencies. It is paid for on privately owned lands out of capital investment or from sales returns.

This towering, overshadowing fact of facts in our American forest economy is amazingly by-passed by foresters in all the branches of the profession. It is most of all avoided by foresters who are charged with the promotion of farm forestry.

Look at the Record. . . .

Now I am going to tell a tale out of school. Eight years ago the American Forest Products Industries organization was set going to educate the public on the general forestry principle that trees are a crop, on the fact that the forest is the one natural resource that replenishes itself, and to tell the good news of many progress programs of American private forest management.

For four years this educational work was conducted with increasing appreciation by the public in general, and particularly by educators. Then, the directors and technical folks of AFPI met, in November, 1945, to add an "action program."

It was decided to (1) carry information on the best forest practices to small forest land owners, including farmers, (2) "encourage an industrial program for the orderly marketing of farm forest products," (3) enlist cooperation from all groups and agencies interested in forestry for the advancement of the entire program.

This was the stuff I'd been wanting to see put into effect ever since my hard luck as a small forest land owner. And now I'm glad to say that No. 1 has been made a real job for four years by this highly efficient outfit, all the while earning more plaudits from educators, farm leaders, state foresters and the U. S. Forest Service.

But No. 2 has remained practically a dead letter. The reason, I think, is that until recently the merchandising of wood was a dead letter in the education and experience of the professional, technically-trained forester and forest engineer. The government forester is still all but prohibited from calling on retail lumber dealers in the course of his professional work. The industry-employed forester, a freeman, nevertheless commonly steers clear of forest products salesmen, their organizations, their meetings, and their literature, and would not be caught dead reading a forest products sales promotion advertisement.

Thus the AFPI "More Trees For America" program remains unknown to the sales and advertising departments of forest industry, and too often farmers fall into the belief that it is just another government program in forest education.

The Farmer's Friend. . . .

There's nothing seriously wrong with all this. I hasten to assert. There's a lack, that's all. To fill the lack first of all it should be recognized that in this region the farm forester-owner's best friends, and all forestry's best friends, are the West Coast lumber companies that advertise West Coast lumber all over the country and have staffs of salable "merchandising" it.

This sort of marketing effort helps everybody who has a crop of wood to sell from his land in Western Oregon and Washington. Such effort does not build up consumer interest in just one company's lumber but in all lumber that is sold as Douglas fir, West Coast hemlock, Western red cedar and Citka spruce.
