Out of the Woods By JIM STEVENS Pa Kettle's Forest Fire . . . Betty MacDonald's famous story, THE EGG AND I, has a chapter that is really a parable on the public problem and the popular appeal that the "Keep Green" movement represents. The chapter is on Pa Kettle and his forest fire. Here is a liberal quotation from it: "Even with the continual rain, July, August, September and even October were bad fire months in the mountains (the Olympics). If you were unfortunate enough to live on a ranch near the Kettles, ANY month was dangerous. It was said that the Kettles set the original peat fires in the valleys and that one summer, Pa, to save himself the effort of mowing the lawn, set fire to the grass and burned off the front porch. The Kettles burned brush any old time of year and if the brush fire got away from them and burned five or ten acres of somebody's timber, that was too bad . . . Home in Danger . . . "It was late October of the second year," Betty MacDonald's story goes on to tell, "when Elwin Kettle drove excitedly into our yard one morning to tell us that their barn was on fire. He said, 'Pa filled the hay mow with wet hay and the darned stuff's combust spontaneous. The Barn's burnin' and it's set the brush in the ravine on fire, too. Ma said to warn you it's probably come up this way because the wind's from the south . . . 'All afternoon cars chugged up our road and then scooted down toward the Kettles.' Bob had spread the alarm and the farmers were answering the call for help. I learned later that Bob had gone even further—he had asked Maxwell Ford Jefferson, the moonshiner, to help and Jeff passed the word on to all his good customers. I made gallons of coffee and hundreds of sandwiches and at about four the fighters came filling wearily in, blackfaced and dirty. They ate sandwiches, drank coffee, and cursed the Kettles. "The smoke rolled up the draw and obscured the sun and stung my eyes while I put out the lanterns and fed the chickens. Each batch of fighters brought more frightening news. 'The fire was almost to the road in several places!' 'The wind was getting stronger.' 'Once the fire hit the timber on our place we would have to run for our lives.' Save That Still . . . Such was the bad news. Then, at around seven in the evening Max Jefferson, the moonshiner, dropped by with a word of cheer. "Just thought I'd drop up and tell you not to worry, honey. I've got the biggest bunch of drunkards in the United States out fightin' that fire 'cause they think my still's up this way." (the time was twenty years ago.) The fire grew worse in the night. Betty tried to choose what she would take with her in case she had to run for it. "It narrowed down finally to the baby, the key of whisky and the animals," she says. "I put my sorority pin and my high school graduation ring in my purse, my silver in the didy bag and we were ready." But the fire burned itself out as a night rain set in. In the end it was only one of the annual thousands of fires that never got a line in the newspapers twenty years ago, and which the people of the woods and farms endured much as they endured colds, rheumatism and pneumonia in the winter time. Today, all but the worst of the Pa Kettles in both Oregon and Washington—the Pa Kettles of the cities, too—are in the line of march with all others for forest fire prevention. So we go forward! TRUCK GETS DUNKED A gravel truck belonging to the Jungwirth Sand and Gravel Co. plunged off the Santiam highway into the river near Tumble Creek Monday morning. The driver of the truck, Basil Green, of King's Trading Post, received only minor scratches on his legs. "The truck had apparently hit a rock in the roadway before being thrown in the river. Tumble Creek is east of Detroit.
