The youngster was following an older brother and his mother through a wooded area along Morgan Road when the deer, recently released from captivity, reared up. The boy's screams brought his brother who drove the deer off.

Severe bruises were the only marks the boy received from the encounter, but the Oregon state game commission draws a lesson from the incident.

According to the state's chief of big game Robert Mace, a deer is natur-the selection of the Marion Creek site for the hatchery. The chief reason, he said, was its water supply. Horn creek which supplements Marion creek in supplying the hatchery with water has not been known to freeze in winter. Also, the water is not as polluted as it would be downstream from the dam.

The Marion Forks hatchery has 60 troughs for incubating eggs, 48 circular ponds for young fish and eight rectangular ponds for larger fish.

Plans call for movement of 400,000 spring chinook, now year-old fingerlings, from Mehama to Marion Forks by fall to begin operations at the new hatchery. Orville Greer, now at the Mehama hatchery, will become superintendent at Marion Forks.

With a capacity of 18 million in the troughs and capable of holding 1.5 to 16 million in the ponds, the Marion Forks hatchery is second only to the Bonneville hatchery in size among the hatcheries of Oregon.

Problems met in building the hatchery were sketched by S. R. Overholser, assistant resident engineer at Detroit Dam. The Gasland Co., Inc., Bellingham, Wash., contracted for the building of the plant and residences of the supervisory personnel for $325,000.

I. E. White, office manager for the contractor said his company expected to finish the work in five months. With as much as seven feet of snow on the ground at one time an unforeseen shutdown resulted. The plant has just been completed. Work on the residences will continue for three more weeks.

Total cost of the hatchery will be more than $600,000. Suomela estimated. Virtually all of the building costs and most of the maintenance cost will be borne by the federal government, he added.

The caravan left Marion Forks for Fern Ridge lake and the rest of the tour which included an overnight stay at Eugene. Sunday, the caravan visited Meridian and Hills Creek dams.
