> 'Life in a European country," he says, "differs in many ways from our American customs. People never hurry; it is customary to take from one to five hours to eat a meal. Sandwiches such as hamburgers or hot dogs, are unknown. A dish ordered in a restaurant is served with a bow, and a meal consists of many courses served by men waiters.

> "Newspapers are not common as very few people can afford a sub-scription. The local cafe or tavern furnishes the local reading material by having a large supply of newspapers and magazines. The purchase of a cup of coffee (at 25 cents a cup) or a bottle of beer entitles the customer to all the reading material available and he may read for hours if he wishes.

"Family life differs from the American standard, in that women do not vote and the man is lord and master, going and coming as he pleases, at all times except on Sundays and holidays. On these days it is customary to escourt his wife to church.

admired for health and durabilitynot for beauty. Beauty shops are patronized only by the very rich, as the use of make-up by a woman of the middle class puts her in a questionable category. The use of rough is scorned, as a young girl can run 20 miles before breakfast to acquire rosy cheeks.

"Ground is precious, with most able land tilled. Flowers are not grown except along window ledges, or in green houses on top of dwellings.

"Cars are few but bicycle traffic is tremendous. Only the very rich can own an automobile, license for which costs $150 a year and gasoline 65 cents a gallon. Highways are not suitable for American cars as the turns are too sharp. City streets are made of cobblestones, placed one at sprinkled in between.
