STEEL IS NOT THE STRONGEST STRUCTURAL MATERIAL

Strangely enough, the strongest structural material is not steel or any other metal, scientists tell us. They say the strongest material capable of manufacture is plywood. Made by cutting logs into thin slices and pressing these together in "sandwiches," with the grain of the wood in alternate layers running in different directions, plywood is so strong that it is now rated as probably the strongest of all manufactured materials. It is used for hundreds of different purposes requiring great strength.
