Civil Defense--

as one of its responsibilities under civil defense the job of mass care—feeding, clothing and shelter. George Emigh, welfare representative for the state civil defense organization, spent three days in the disaster area helping co-ordinate welfare activities.

Marion county civil defense arranged for some radio communications, transportation, and provided extra police protection by sending members of the Woodburn sheriff's reserve.

The State civil defense office obtained a fire truck from the State Vocational Education department for the fire area. It also arranged for sending back-pack pump cans, which were obtained from Clackamas and Marion county fire departments. Deschutes and Linn county Red Cross chapters each had one physician and six nurses on a standby basis in case they were needed.

Foresters kept in touch with the state civil defense office, which in turn relayed periodic fire reports to CD volunteers in Linn, Marion and Deschutes counties. Many press and radio inquiries also were handled through the state civil defense office when phone lines to the Detroit Ranger station were jammed.

Fire fighting activities were all under the U. S. and State Forestry departments, Hayes pointed out. But when word came from the ranger station that part of the North Santiam population should evacuate, civil defense swung into action.

Civil defense volunteers pitched in at the fire near Portland the week before, and they also took part in disaster work in Douglas county, but the Sardine Creek fire gave them first chance in real problems of evacuation, mass care and overall co-ordination

The DEBUNKER

By John Harvey Farbay, Ph.D.

The much-discussed "flying snakes" of Malay are as unable to fly as are the snakes of this country. There are no flying snakes anywhere in the world. The Malay snakes climb to the tops of trees, then flatten their bodies, and glide downward to the lower branches of other trees nearby. They cannot go upward while in the air, as they would do if they could fly.

of activities. "The fire also showed that one doesn't have to live in a metropolitan area to benefit from civil defense preparations," said Jack Hayes. "As fire and flood victims know, disaster can hit everywhere."
