Difference Between Watch, Guard Dog

So many people who get a dog do so because they want one "that will be a good watch dog."

That's all very well and good—up to a point, declares Harry Miller, director of the Gaines Dog Research Center, New York. Unfortunately, he states, so few people realize that a dog trained to be hostile to all strangers may take a slice out of rich Uncle Joe who is just coming for a surprise visit, or bite some youngster who climbs over the garden fence just as readily as he will attack a burglar.

That home is rare indeed which requires the services of a specially-trained guard dog, who renders his best service on large estates, in business houses, industrial plants and civil and military institutions of various kinds. What the average family needs for guarding the home is the average house dog, Mr. Miller says. He notes that an ordinary family dog will usually bark loudly and in varying degrees; in friendly greeting when someone comes to the door, warningly when an intruder creeps into the cellar or when a fire breaks out unexpectedly. If some stranger with a bludgeon in his hand attempts to sneak up on a member of the family, this same house pet may very likely take a piece out of the intruder's leg, or at least interfere with his work. The dog will likewise probably raise a considerable rumpus if some stranger tries to snatch the baby out of its carriage.

The true guard dog, on the other hand, must be trained as such, he states. He is taught to be hostile to everyone, ready to spring at the slightest provocation. He is tied up most of the time; for there's nothing like being chained up a lot to develop unfriendly attitude in a dog. And he must be chained up, or kennelled, when not under direct supervision of his owner.
