Out of the Woods

By JAMES STEVENS

The "Commercial" Forest . . .

Today the Pacific northwest—Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Montana west of the Bitter Roots—has 72.7 million acres which are classified as forest land by the Forest Survey of the U. S. Forest Service. This classification is in two technical divisions, "non-commercial" and "commercial". The region has 56.4 million acres of commercial forest land. It is land physically able to grow marketable timber crops and which no law or decree has excluded from industrial or farm logging operations.

The commercial forests of all species stand on the land in a variety of public and private ownerships that are commonly intermingled. Farmers and the forest industry are the major private owners, with state departments of forestry and the U. S. Forest Service the principal public administrators.

The commercial class of forests in all public and private ownerships is managed mainly for the purpose of providing all divisions of forest industry in the region with essential raw material, now and in the future.

Wealth of the Cutover . . .

The 54.4 million acres of commercial forest land in the Pacific northwest not only support a resource of trees but a resource of people. This fact shows up distinctly from the vantage point of the logger's stump. The cutover area in view spells a story of standing timber that has been reshaped into trade items by work of men and machines. In the process of producing for national and world markets, the movement of tree from stump has yielded wages, profits, taxes, interest purchase of supplies and services, payment of railroad and shipping bills.

Such returns are repeated throughout the manufacturing process and movement to wholesale and retail markets and to the end uses of the tree. Then the tree's service may continue for a century and more—like that of lumber in an old house, which may continue to produce rental income after a century of use.

Certain stumps in the cutover reflect newspapers streaming from presses in far cities. Others tell of the building of churches and schools and railroads. The record of good or bad utilization is in the logging leftovers. The standing snags, or the lack of them among the stumps, are a chapter on forest-fire danger and defense. Many other features present the commercial forest cutover as an open book on a great natural resource in dynamic use by men at work with trees.

The "Non-Commercial" Forest . . .

The non-commercial forest land of the Pacific northwest amounts to 16.3 million acres. The greater part of this acreage is on sites that range from acid muck of swamps to steep and stony ground of high altitudes. On such acres the growth is commonly brush, "weck trees", or other trees that are incapable of yielding merchantable wood products.

Minor segments of the non-commercial forest acreage have merchantable timber of high quality but stand on lands that have been set aside by fed-
