

STOPPER Crews at Detroit dam on North Santiam river gently ease 18-ton slab of reinforced concrete into place at mouth of diversion tunnel. Fourteen of slabs were used to plug tunnel through which river flowed two years. Second man from right holds telephone to direct crane operator atop cliff. At right is intake of temporary bypass tunnel.

Construction crews called these concrete slabs big "headaches." Dam, completed ahead of schedule, is backing up lake which will cover the old Detroit site.

James B. Kesterson of Mill City proudly displays the huge trout he caught in the deep hole downstream from the railroad bridge at Mill City last week. The fish weighed six pounds, two ounces, and was 28 1/4 inches in length. Kesterson uses a butcher's scales and rules to prove the size of his prize catch. He caught the fish with a spinner. PANORAMA View of Detroit dam on North Santiam shows highway across top, partially complete powerhouse (left at river level) and main highway grade on opposite bank. Two-year project passed milestone Tuesday with plugging of diversion tunnel through which river flowed during construction. Water began backing up into reservoir.

BEHEMOTH Upstream face of dam has five outlet valves visible. Mouth of 1300-foot diversion tunnel was at lower left. Concrete slabs were lowered from cliff top to block it. Reservoir filled fast.

BOSS Head man at Detroit job is Russell Hoffman, general superintendent for Consolidated Builders, contractors for dam.

GRAND NEW This is beginning of new Detroit lake. Photo was taken 30 minutes before the crews finished plugging diversion tunnel. Lake eventually will be nine miles upstream. (Photos by Robert P. Veness)

TUNNEL Water swirls over partially barricaded mouth of Detroit dam diversion tunnel. Bridge supports will carry highway over lip of dam. Each concrete slab used as plug was coated with mastic to act as a sealer. (Photos courtesy of The Oregonian)
