New Weed Killer Proving Effective

Right half of this strawberry bed was treated with the new weed-killer. Heavy weed growth in the untreated section shows its value to the farmer and home gardener.

A weed killer, that is not actually a weed killer when sprayed, is proving itself effective, especially in areas where strawberries are the principal crop.

Brought out last year as CRAG Herbicide 1, the chemical is so composed that it is not an active weed killer until soil microorganisms work on it and change it chemically. Once this action takes place, the chemical becomes an effective weed killer... and a safe one.

By its very nature it can be sprayed on crops with little or no danger of drift damage to the foliage of nearby crops. When such drift occurs, the material is harmless until it reaches the soil where it goes to work on the weeds but not the crops.

Manufactured by Carbide and Carbon Chemicals Company, a Division of Union Carbide and Carbon Corporation, of New York, its value to growers has already been proven in commercial operations. For example, at Seabrook Farms, Bridgeton, New Jersey, tests on asparagus plots actually brought a yield increase of 17 percent, and appreciably decreased weeding costs.

The new weed killer is currently being tested on other crops. Tests already completed indicate that it also has promise for use in sweet corn, and field corn, corn and bulb type crops and nursery stock.

This new weed killer does not kill weeds greater than 1/4 inch high. For that reason, the chemical is applied on ground that is clean-cultivated. In this way the chemical kills germinating weeds and weed seed in the top layer of soil.

Growers should consult their local county agent or state experiment station on the dosages recommended for the use of this remarkable weed killer.
