Better Rural Library-

ests and needs and capacities. Text-books would be much larger and cumbersome if they attempted to meet the needs of all types of children. Public classrooms demand GROUP teaching.

"How can the library help?" "Suppose we have nine children. Three will probably be able to complete the work assigned in textbooks and the supplements provided; but three are three that learn so quickly they are through long before the first group finish their work. What shall the teacher do? Use her precious time providing busy-work for these restless wigglers? Other children (maybe yours) need her more, but if left idle the quick, alert child will disrupt the discipline of the school and become a Bad Child. Suppose we had a county library. Every two weeks or so a Bookmobile would roll up to the school house door and a Book Lady with a house full of books would help these small learners find beautiful books (not lessons) full of the most wonderful stories: make-believe for one type of child, true stories for the matter-of-fact, stories about our world for the embryo scientist, farm stories, town stories, animal stories, reading matter to appeal to the interest and stir the delight of the child and all told in words he has mastered in his lessons.

"But we had three other members of this class of nine. They are the ones who find it hard to learn because of various reasons. Health conditions, home conditions, distractions of many children for an only-child, dozens of things may account for the difficulty, but they most of all need help and material. Perhaps the lessons are fairy tales which John cannot like, or maybe they are about animals and Dick hasn't had an idea but cars in his mind for four years and is bored with anything less. Whatever the problem, we know the child will have an inner compulsion to read IF his interest in the material is stirred enough. It is here the resources of the larger library come into play. Especially when the child has the privilege of exploring many books in search of one he likes. It is here a "While the foregoing is based on needs of six-year-olds, every grade through the twelve has needs which are equally important. Perhaps some time I will tell you of the high school junior who, having learned to find his answers in books, spent last summer studying advanced chemistry. Each month he went to Salem to the state library to find the books that were not available in Linn county; and without other help he did a fine piece of research work. He had learned the lessons the library teaches. Samuel Johnson once said, 'Knowledge is of two kinds. We know a subject ourselves, or we know where we can find information upon it.'

trained librarian can best help overloaded teachers find just what the child needs. There are books of high reading interest with a low-grade vocabulary, which leads the child on with few hard words to stumble over. He thus catches the thrill of finding out facts and entertainment by himself. Before he realizes that he has been studying, he can read! No longer is he slow, dull, discouraged; he is master of the key to learning, a real success.

"Too often we parents do not realize the need for the child to read well. Too many times all the child has at home to read is comics. Books to supply any of these nine pupils with the kind and quality of books they need are expensive; and once read, a new book is sought. This is too expensive for most families. It is also too expensive for most schools. And to provide ALL the books needed for ALL the schools would be a staggering sum. This is where the county library would serve, especially with a Bookmobile—then EACH book could be read by all the pupils of a given grade in at least eighteen school rooms by being left for a two-week period. Instead of one book to read, each child would have had the chance to read eighteen books.

"If you would like to see your six-year-old land in the upper ten percent of his senior class in high school, you will see to it that he early learns how and what to read. Not all good readers win the scholarships, but it is safe to say that those who do win have read well and widely."
