For What It's Worth

By CLIFFORD P. ROWE
Forest Grove, Ore.

A professor of mine many years ago was once criticized by a feminine student because she found some of the assigned reading to be "indecent and shocking". At the time I thought his answer a very wise one when he responded with "If a person is looking for sex, he can find it anywhere — even in a Montgomery Ward catalog."

However, if my old professor is living today, he will have to swallow those words because Montgomery Ward in its fall catalog has removed all sex.

It seems that some research man made the depressing discovery that lovely limbs in sheer hose and curvaceous cuties in gripping girdles, while perhaps eye-catching, did nothing whatsoever to increase the sale of those articles. As a result came the tradition shattering decision to display feminine attire minus its usual interior adornment.

Now I am fully aware that big business is primarily interested in making lots of money and that beauty for beauty's sake is entirely out of its line of thinking. Nevertheless, after studying the decision in all its aspects, I have come to the conclusion that Montgomery Ward has dealt the most deadly blow to recreational reading since the advent of indoor plumbing.

Referred to in some areas as the "shepherders' bible" and in others as the poor man's Esquire, the bulky mail order catalog has for decades enjoyed a prominent place, and rightly so, in the leisure time activity of the huge American public. From the little one in the family, who cut out the pretty ladies to use as dolls, to the lonely bachelor, too timid for burlesque, who would gaze for hours at page after page of innocent beauty, the catalog came into its own as the most widely studied publication in the United States.

I fear for the results of the company's drastic move. I am afraid that its vast horde of former readers will now be forced to go to modern magazine where women posed in various degrees of nudity will have motives far removed from that of selling an article for $3.98.
