Foundation for Blind Observes Centennial of Braille's Death

The passing of Louis Braille, originator of the raised dot reading and writing system which bears his name, 100 years ago, is now being observed around the world. M. Robert Barnett, the Executive Director of the American Foundation for the Blind, pointed out that since only 20 per cent of the 260,000 blind persons in the United States know braille, "It is important to promote the teaching of this system in every possible manner."

Helen Keller, outstanding user of Braille's system, once wrote "Braille is the key to books in many languages. We who are without sight celebrate the achievement of one who poured the sweetness of tangible printed words into the bitter waters of our affliction."

As part of the international observance of the centennial of Louis Braille's death, the American Foundation for the Blind and its affiliate, the American Foundation for Overseas Blind, have jointly issued a special commemorative seal to be widely circulated. The seals will be distributed in sheets of 50 each by organizations and groups which show a deep interest in the fortunes of blind people.

Intended not primarily to raise money, but to foster public awareness of the increased opportunities afforded to the blind through the development of modern teaching methods based on the use of braille, Mr. Barnett advised that individual contributions received through the distribution of these seals will be earmarked for braille printing presses and other equipment for workshops and schools here and abroad.
