There was a time when "elegance" as applied to meals could have had nothing to do with a budget—but it's not so today. Good taste is the key to everything we eat and wear today, and food, like fashion, sparks a flavor of elegance when good taste is assured with Ac'cent (pure monosodium glutamate).

This unique seasoning, which intensifies and holds natural food flavors, has become so well recognized by budget-conscious food processors as their key to good taste, that it is included in over 1000 nationally known brands of canned and packaged foods. The housewife, taking her cue from commercial food people, is now learning that a shake from the "third shaker" will give her tastier meals for less at home.

Pointers also may be learned from the chef—who must combine glamour and low-cost in catering to discriminating tastes. Today, Ac'cent is his assurance of flavor in every dish. Chef Ernest of the Waldorf Astoria, who knows as well as anyone, the importance of simple good taste, passes on his recipe for "Seafood Waldorf" as a suggestion to the homemaker for budget entertaining in elegant style. Buffet service from a chafing dish and the latest accent in fashion lend the final touch of splendor to this relatively inexpensive one-dish meal.

Out of the Woods.

By JAMES STEVENS

Joe Genetics . . . While up from the boompond shack for shopping, I bought a little spruce tree in the kind of place that used to be called "the dime store." It was labeled "Genuine Minnesota Spruce Christmas Tree".

And these trees were selling. Each specimen had form, symmetry, density of branches, and other elements that combined to make a near-perfect table ornament of Christmas tree character. The trees had been bred that way, perhaps through seed selection, maybe by managed pollination and other practices of GENETICS as an applied science in the forest. Now any technically trained foreester could readily identify one of these selectively bred black spruce as a specimen of a family of forest plants, and then outline its neighborhood, or environment, and the influences of such relationships. ECOLOGY, that is. And then he might introduce you to dendrology. You can look that one up for yourself.

Popple and Puppies . . . Popple is a species of aspen that grows on the fire-made barrens of the lake states as alder and vine maple do on the west coast. It is a tree that commonly rots before it can mature into sawtimber. But it has a tough fiber. Since the Cloquet, Minn., fire of 1918, forest products scientists have been working to convert popple fiber into consumer items. Now a large Michigan company has foresters at work on the popple problem, not on more ways to utilize the wild weed trees of nature, but on prospects of breeding this vital, tough and prolific aspen species into a better growing domesticated tree—of using specimens with exceptionally desirable characteristics to create new strains.

The great genetical improvements in the species of Indian maize that the Pilgrims found on Cape Cod in 1820 have been made mostly since 1917. The dairy cow is another example of this science at work. On the dark side of genetics are the modern monstrosities of dogdom that are shamelessly exhibited at every show of so-called "pure-bred" canines. These puppies are examples of genetics perverted. The nightmarish dogs of the fancy breeders outdo the horrible hodags of the Bunyan myths. For good or ill, the forestry sciences are growing as the trees grow on the land, and we all should pitch in to help make the most of them, as the Minnesota Christmas tree growers are doing—and as the growers of Montana Douglas fir Christmas trees are doing.

Forestry, in all its branches, has its final and most vital effect as an act on the land. It is through this effect, resulting in more profitable utilization of the tree crops we have and in putting acreage that has been idle or unproductive to work again as tree-growing land, that forestry has sold itself to farmers, industrial executives and government officials and legislators.

So the foresters are leading a new and mighty march of progress on the 55,000,000 acres of lake states forest land. So they are in New York, which imports 70 percent of the lumber and 58 percent of the pulpwood consumed in the state. New York now has 4,000,000 acres classified as "idle or unproductive forest land." While up in the small northeast corner of the state alone 18 large pulp and paper mills are showing the way to new markets for tree crops, encouraging York states all over to follow the foresters in restoring tree production to their idle land.

That's coming competition, friends. These Minnesota Christmas trees are like the proverbial cloud no bigger than a man's hand.
