GG Ampules Become Barrage on Polio

Here's one step in sterile filling of ampules of gamma globulin, the blood fraction which March of Dimes-aided scientists found gives a degree of temporary protection against paralytic polio. Approximately 55,000 children took part in the field trials which established GG as the first substance to counteract polio. Workers here wear goggles, hoods and masks to help maintain sterility and for protection against severe "sunburn" from ultra violet light which floods the room.
