Out of the Woods

By JAMES STEVENS

Seeing Eye to Eye

A farmer who does his own logging in the James River valley in Virginia, where trees were felled for export 343 years ago, has a view that differs greatly from that of the industrial forest engineer and the power-saw logger in the giant wilderness Douglas firs and West Coast hemlocks that stand westward under the snow peaks of the Cascade Mountains of Oregon and Washington.

In the first area there are places where five crops of trees have been grown, harvested and sent to market. In the big-timber region of the West the transition from old forests to new is only at the halfway mark. The differences are as great in other main phases of the forest management problem.

However, first principles of forest management are basically the same everywhere in the American woods, as seen in a stump's eye view from the angle of the man who lives by the logger's trade and from that of the technically-trained forester.

Forest Hub

The stump is the hub of operation for private enterprise in the American forest. The stump is the hub around which the law of supply and demand revolves in sustaining the flow of forest products to markets and end uses and in sustaining the return flow of revenue that provides for payments of wages, taxes, dividends, and all other costs of production—including that of applied forestry on the land.

"Forestry begins at the stump," the industrial foresters agree. The problem of applied forestry that centers on the stump in any part of the country is first of all that of producing and protecting new tree growth around each stump of the log harvest. The solution commonly begins with the logging plan. Trees are reserved from cutting to work as seed sources for the new forest.

In the Douglas fir region forestry commonly dictates "patch logging," which will clear one area and leave solid blocks or strips of seed trees standing for years. In pine regions specific types of trees are selected for the logging, leaving all the trees that own the ability to grow wood for many more years.

The Common Ground . . .
The planting of seedling forest trees among the stumps by hand or by the amazing new tree-planting machines is too costly to be employed except where the chances for natural reforestation are poor.

For decades the annual number of United States forest fires ran close to 200,000, and each year from 25,000,000 to 50,000,000 acres were burned. By far the greater part of this acreage was farm land which farmers fired year after year to "bring on the grass."

This ruinous tradition of land use dies hard. Then on land that has been burned again and again the new forest must be planted by hand or machine. There are big black holes of old burns in the great forests of the West.

Methods of sowing tree seeds by helicopter are being tried out there by the forest industries to make idle land productive. Fire remains the enormous risk that private enterprise must face in the forests, and face it through as many as 80 fire seasons in the growing of a new industrial forest from the stumps of the old.

All forest owners—government, industry and farm—find common ground and see eye to eye on the forest fire problem.
