Facts and Figures--

for the Willamette Basin, Detroit Dam's authority for power was not authorized until June, 1948.

Surveys for Detroit Dam were first made in 1940, but World War II intervened. Relocation of fifteen miles of North Santiam highway got under way in May 1947, under supervision of the Bureau of Public Roads and the Oregon State Highway Commission in co-operation with the U. S. Forest Service.

Actual excavation for the foundation of the main dam got under way in the spring of 1949. Three quarters of a million yards of material had to be excavated to get to solid rock for the foundation.

First concrete was poured in August 1949. The bottom of the dam is 339 feet thick. The contractor reached the top pouring concrete in September 1952.

The powerhouse was started in September 1951, and will not be completed until September 1953. Big Cliff re-regulating dam, several miles downstream, will be ready to re-regulate the stream flow in October when the second generator at Detroit Dam goes into operation. Power from Big Cliff Dam in the amount of 18,000 kilowatts is due in April 1954.

During construction of Detroit Dam, the peak labor force was 1,300 men. The average force was 1,000. There were no labor difficulties at any time during construction, something of a record in these turbulent times.
