Salem's Mayor Loucks Seeks State Representative Job

Al Loucks of Salem is filing today for representative of Marion county. It is frequently of Al Loucks that he worked harder as being a good mayor of Salem than any man who ever held the position. It is not surprising because he has tackled every civic responsibility with the same earnestness and drive.

Few Salem business leaders have given so generously of their time and effort to civic and state affairs. He is president of the League of Oregon Cities, after serving as a director and vice-president. He is a past president and campaign chairman of the Salem Community Chest. He is past president of the Salem Breakfast Club and the Salem Fuel Dealers Association. He has served or is serving as a director of the Salem YMCA, Oregon Heating Industries and the Salem Kiwanis Club. He has served as a deacon of the First Presbyterian church.

Elected mayor of Salem in 1950, he was re-elected in 1952. While many cities have materially increased taxes to meet the rising costs of administration, there has been but one minor increase in Salem. Loucks is a hard man with the tax dollar. The addition of new fire fighting equipment and increased efficiency of fire department personnel earned Salem an insurance reclassification that is saving property owners $75,000 a year, with the prospect of a further class change that will save $150,000 a year more.

During his term as mayor, a Park Advisory board was organized to plan park development and use. A separate planning division was added to the Zoning and Planning Commission with special responsibility for modernizing Salem's traffic control. Loucks introduced a program for taking city government to the people. In more than 175 forums before civic and other organized groups he discussed city problems, introduced other city officials, and invited questions from the floor on how city business was handled.
