Oregon Hardwood
Management, Use
Told In Booklet

Prospects of expanding markets for Ore. hardwood may soon prompt the state to take a closer look at its maple, alder, oak and other hardwood trees, according to foresters at Oregon State college.

At present, Pacific Northwest good quality hardwood is handicapped by long-haul freight rates to major markets in the east. However, southern California shows signs of becoming a "second Grand Rapids" in furniture production, offering a new potential for Oregon hardwoods, says Gary Sander, OSC forest products marketing specialist.

Details of hardwood management, marketing, and manufacturing are discussed in a new bulletin, "Oregon Hardwoods," published by OSC extension service. Free copies are available from county extension offices or the OSC bulletin clerk, Corvallis.

The 16-page illustrated booklet was prepared by Sander in cooperation with the Polk county farm forestry committee. It includes recommendations for turning out high grade material for factory or industrial lumber through proper logging, sawing, drying, and surfacing.

Hardwood production methods differ considerably from those for Douglas fir which most western Oregon sawmill operators understand, says Sander. As a result, improperly manufactured material has in some instances injured the sale of northwest hardwoods despite their good quality, the specialist explains.

Western markets would give local producers an advantage of at least $25 a thousand board feet over eastern growers, the bulletin points out. Present and potential uses are listed for red alder, Bigleaf maple, Oregon ash, chinquapin, black cottonwood, Pacific Madrone, California black oak, Oregon white oak, myrtle, tanoak, and Pacific dogwood.

Tire wear can indicate faulty braking, bad wheel alignment, oversteering and improper air pressure. Inspect your tires regularly for worn spots, tears and scrapes, and maintain recommended inflation.

FOX VALLEY

Mrs. J. H. Johnston

The light rain Monday night helped to cool the sultry atmosphere, but a heavier rain is badly needed. Current temperatures have been high. Sunday and Monday was 95, cooling to 70 by 4:30 p. m.

Hugh Johnston and his uncle, Lon Titus were Salem visitors Monday. Titus is here from Condon for a visit at the Johnston homes. He attended the State Fair last week. Mrs. Jack Johnston is his sister. Mrs. Nellie Comstock of Medford is his youngest sister. The Titus family were all born and raised on the farm now owned by Elmer Phillip on Rt. 1, Stayton, near Kingston.

Mrs. Maude Davis of Gates was a Saturday business caller in Fox Valley.

Mrs. Ethel Thayer spent the week end with his sister Zella Siegmund in Stayton.

Mrs. Charles Power is employed as Art teacher in Stayton high school this term. School opened Monday. (Too Late For Last Week)

A business visitor in this locality last Thursday was Lawrence Olson of Corvallis.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Gourley of Rt. 2 Albany were Thursday business visitors in Fox Valley.

Paul Schiewek of Lyons is doing some carpentry work on the house occupied by the Marshall Powell family. The building is being repaired on the exterior and will be repainted later.

Lon Titus of Condon arrived here Thursday of last week to spend some time with the J. H. and Hugh Johnston's and attend the State Fair. The Hugh Johnston family were Friday and Saturday Salem visitors.

Mrs. Edith Thayer spent the week-end in Stayton assisting her sister in Zella's Coffee Shop.

Mr. and Mrs. Marvin Walker and family returned Friday afternoon from a two week's vacation in California where they visited his mother and Mrs. Walker's father and mother. They also visited Disney Land.

Mr. and Mrs. Floyd Bassett were Thursday evening visitors in Mill City.

Thursday night's rain was a welcome change in the weather. A longer rain would have been greatly appreciated.

The local grade school is scheduled to open September 8th.
