Bug Bites And Breathing

Summer means cook-outs at the shore, picnics in grassy parks and plenty of pests. Bees, wasps, ants, and yellow jackets.

Insects can be a pain, literally. Their bites can cause wheezing, nausea, dizziness, even comas. Sometimes their stings are fatal.

Treatment for reactions to insect bites should be prompt, especially when severe reactions develop hours after the sting.

At a meeting of the American Academy of Allergy, Dr. James H. Barnard said that delayed reactions are more likely to go untreated. In his study of 50 fatalities from insect bites, more than half received no treatment at all. As many as 14 percent showed no reaction to the sting until at least 24 hours later.

Severe reactions to insect stings often involve the respiratory tract. Some obstruction occurs, and breathing is impeded. Fluids in excessive amounts fill tissue spaces. Blood vessels can collapse. Severe reactions can hit people who have been stung earlier by the same insects with no ill effects. Not all severe reactions, of course, result in death.

If a person knows he is sensitive to certain insects, he should consult his doctor. Doctors should be called—immediately—when severe reactions do happen.

In some cases, doctors train insect-sensitive patients to give themselves injections, usually epinephrine, in anticipation of emergencies. In the study conducted by Dr. Barnard, for example, several persons actually died during the long wait for an ambulance. An immediate injection might have averted the catastrophe.

For information about allergies and many kinds of respiratory disorders, see The Willamette Tuberculosis and Health Assn., 1890 State Street, Salem. It's a matter of life and breath.
