This new power plant will supply the Northwest with 1,400,000 kilowatts of electric power. The first unit, on the left, begins operation in September. The second unit is scheduled to start up a year later.

Centralia power plant Progress Report:

ON SCHEDULE!

The large coal-fired power plant near Centralia, Washington, is right on schedule. In September its first 700,000-kilowatt generator will be ready to start producing electricity needed to keep this region adequately supplied. A year later its twin will go to work.

This huge and modern plant is a milestone. It is the first major plant making electricity from steam in a region which traditionally has used hydroelectric power. It also is the first step in a far-sighted program worked out by the area's power producers to guarantee the Pacific Northwest sufficient electric energy with which to live—and on which to build. Seven other power agencies are participating with Pacific Power & Light Company in this important undertaking.

The next several months will be a "tune-up period" for this $200,000,000 plant. We'll be checking not only the plant's power production, but other things that are important, too. Such as the massive installation of electrostatic precipitators. We have to be sure they're tuned up just right so the plant will more than meet the strict standards of air quality for the area. And the closed circuit water system. We must be sure it will avoid pollution of the Skookumchuck River as it is designed to do. And the restoration program for the nearby lands from which comes the coal to fuel the plant.

After all, the Centralia plant has a bigger job than just producing electricity essential to the region. It has to be a "good neighbor," too!
