Bankruptcy: A Clean Slate?
Almost two billion dollars in debts will be wiped out this year in the nation's bankruptcy courts. Almost one American in every 1,000 will take this means of "getting out from under."
Most of them will emerge with a clean slate. However, there are certain kinds of obligations that bankruptcy does not touch. The most important are:

1) Taxes less than three years old. This includes taxes owed to federal, state, or local governments.
2) Debts based on family obligations. This includes alimony and child support.
3) Debts based on a written false financial statement. Suppose, for example, that in obtaining a personal loan you deceive the lender by purposefully understating your liabilities. Under these circumstances, you would ordinarily remain liable for the loan even after going through bankruptcy.

4) Debts based on "willful and malicious" injury inflicted on persons or property. Usually this involves liability for causing an automobile accident. Thus: A drunken driver, traveling at high speed on a rainy night, swerved across the double line and smashed into an oncoming car. Held liable afterward in damages, he sought refuge in bankruptcy. But a court said bankruptcy did not wipe out this debt, because his driving was not just negligent but "willful and malicious."

Non-auto injuries may also be considered willful and malicious. In another case, a man allowed his vicious bulldog to run free even after it had bitten three pedestrians. When a fourth victim went to court and won a sizeable verdict, the dog's owner tried to escape through bankruptcy. But again, a court held him still liable. The judge said bankruptcy laws were meant to protect the hapless debtor, not the malicious wrongdoer.

"It's a great pity there isn't a pesticide available for controlling the litterbug."

Tourist Count Down Over Previous Year

Visitor counts taken at the state's six border information centers continued to reveal a drop in the number of visitors when compared to last year. August totals for 1973 were 17.9% less than August of 1972, according to Victor B. Fryer, travel information director for the state highway division.
The six centers opened this year on May 1, and by the end of August they had served 173,116 visitors. During August, they served 58,278 visitors. This was a slight increase over the month of July.
"Tourist flow seemed to pick up a little during August," Fryer said, "but still not to the pace of last year." He said he felt the centers were extremely important this summer, perhaps more so than during any other year."
