Here are 5 air ways from Col. Watt ...to help you cool your house this summer and still conserve energy!

Are they still sending kids up in those crates?

1. For cooling your home, a setting of 78 degrees is comfortable for almost everyone. And you can save at least 5% on operating costs for each additional degree you raise the thermostat on your cooling system. (Besides, your system won't cool any faster at a lower setting. It'll just waste energy by continuing to cool after the comfort level has been reached.)

2. When you're buying an air conditioner, be sure to get the most effective model... one that provides the most BTU's of cooling for every watt of electricity used. If you're a whiz at math, you can check a unit's efficiency by dividing the BTU rating by the number of watts it takes to run it. (Major manufacturers provide this information under the heading EER, for Energy Efficiency Ratio.)

3. Vent clothes dryers, bathrooms and kitchens to help reduce the air conditioning load. And ventilate your attic. An oven-like attic makes your air conditioner work harder because the heat up there can reach 140 to 160 degrees! (A thermostatically controlled attic fan can help push heat out of your attic, too.)

4. Make sure, with proper maintenance, that your air conditioner is working properly at all times. Clogged filters, dirty cooling coils, anything that's out of adjustment can drag down a unit's efficiency. (You can handle some maintenance routines yourself, but others require a serviceman's expert touch.)

5. Control the sun. If you have acres of glass that the sun pours through, try to reduce exposure. How? See-through polyester shields are one good way. Bamboo blinds are another. A generous roof overhang and minimum window area also help. (And, as a long term investment in energy conservation, you can plant shade trees.)

Join Col. Watt's summer air patrol. Keep cool and conserve!
