THE FAMILY LAWYER

Waste Basket Evident—

Detectives suspected that Murray, staying in a downtown hotel, was involved in illicit gambling. One evening they checked the contents of his waste basket after it had been removed from the room by a maid. Sure enough, they found telltale numbers slips. When the case came to court, Murray's lawyer objected to this evidence on grounds of "unreasonable search and seizure." He pointed out that the detectives had no warrant to search the waste basket. But the court found the evidence admissible and Murray guilty.

"Once the discarded items were outside the room," said the court, "they were in the public domain."

As a rule, the constitutional protection against unreasonable search and seizure does not apply to articles that have been abandoned. This is true even though they were abandoned under the pressure of pursuit.

In another case a speeding motorist, noticing a police car following him, tossed a package of narcotics out the window into an open field.

Police retrieved the package. And again, a court ruled that the evidence was valid. The court said the man had clearly abandoned possession of the package before the police picked it up.

But there must also be an intent-to-abandon. Another man, sitting in a taxi, dropped a box of pills on the floor when a policeman walked up. Here too the officer seized the box.

In these circumstances, however, a court decided later that the box could not be used as evidence. The court said that although it had been laid aside momentarily, it was still within the man's reach—still, for all practical purposes, within his possession. "An occupied taxicab," observed the judge, "is not to be compared with an open field."
