THE FAMILY LAWYER

Roadblock to Bankruptcy—

As an aftermath of an auto accident, a motorist is walloped by a big verdict in the courtroom. It is more money than he is insured for, more money than he can possibly scrape together. Can he "get out from under" by going into bankruptcy?

Not necessarily. It depends on how wrongfully he had behaved in bringing about the accident. The law says that not even bankruptcy will wipe out liability for "wilful and malicious" injuries inflicted upon others.

Consider an example: A motorist, driving home drunk from a party, ran down and killed a pedestrian. Held legally liable, he sought relief in bankruptcy.

But the evidence showed that 1) his driving had been negligent, and 2) he had announced at the beginning of the party that he fully intended to get drunk before heading for home.

This deliberate disregard for safety, said the court, put his conduct into the "wilful and malicious" category and barred him from getting relief in bankruptcy.

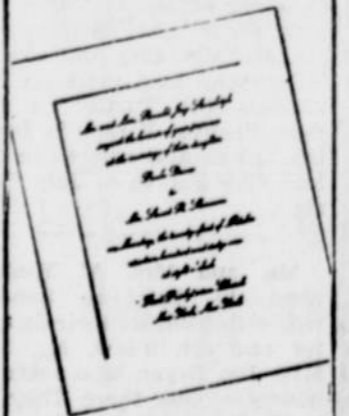

But in another case, the motorist had caused a collision merely by driving too fast through an intersection. Finding him guilty of nothing more than a momentary lapse of attention, the court said this could not be described as wilful and malicious.

Result: the motorist was able to escape a heavy burden of liability by going into bankruptcy.

Suppose that after a collision a motorist gets into an argument, loses his temper, and beats up the other driver. If he is held liable later for assault and battery, he would not be able to use the bankruptcy way out.

An assault and battery, say the courts, is the kind of intentional wrongdoing that the Bankruptcy Act was never intended to forgive.
