Repairman In Your Home

Jackson hired a painter to repair and refinish his kitchen ceiling. But the man had scarcely started work when a loose chunk of plaster came crashing down on his head. Could Jackson be held legally liable for the mishap?

No, a court ruled, because the faulty condition of the ceiling was just as obvious to the painter as to Jackson. The court said he had "assumed the risk" of falling plaster by undertaking the job in the first place.

This is the law's usual attitude when a householder employs somebody to do repair work. The repairman is expected to notice — and accept — those hazards that are "natural" to the employment.

Consider another case applying a similar principle: A tree surgeon was summoned to trim the dead wood from a large oak. During the operation he put too much weight on a decayed bough. The bough snapped off, dumping him to the ground.

Again, the victim tried to collect damages from the home owner. But in this case too, the court ruled that he had no claim. The court pointed out that the nature of the task gave him fair warning that such an accident could occur.

On the other hand, the householder must indeed speak up about risks that the workman would not ordinarily notice.

In another case, a man was hired to shovel snow from the roof of a garage. Unbeknownst to him, a strip of roofing paper had buckled upward. He caught his foot on the paper and suffered a painful fall. Under these circumstances, a court held that the home owner could be held liable for not warning the man about the roofing paper. The court said this hazard, hidden beneath the snow, was not the sort of thing a shoveller was likely either to see or watch out for.
